Synopsis of Chapters Already Published

One stormy night a ship is wrecked off the Scottish fishing village of Inverloch, and of all those on board only one man is rescued. The survivor is carried to the cottage of Donnie Dalgleish, where he is nursed. The sensation is increased when the man gives his name as "Charles Edward Casimir," for such also was the name of the great Stuart Pretender. There is a mystery about the man, and his name, named Janet Glen, who has nothing to do with her neighbors, and is believed to be a spy, and the man, who has the powers of a king, is believed to be the man who has the powers of a king. Janet Glen, who has nothing to do with her neighbors, and is believed to be a spy, and the man, who has the powers of a king, is believed to be the man who has the powers of a king.

THE "clan" gathering was held in the schoolhouse across the street. There was never such a gathering—at least of the clan. That which was previously looked upon as a convention of hot-headed Scotch maniacs was afterward printed in the history of Inverloch as the most remarkable instance of volcanic eruption in all the annals of Jacobite rebellion. It would be useless to attempt a description of what happened that night. In fact, the happening was of that nature which defies any description but confusion. Only the result is certain, and the result was as unexpected as it was startling. Witness the fact that one man was carried out of the schoolhouse, dead of heart failure.

The meeting began quietly enough. It had more the air of a social gathering, but the fact that everybody was there assured something unusual from the beginning. In the first place, Janet Glen was there, and she was not alone. More remarkable was the fact that her escort was Dr. Tom Wallace, a well-known physician, and a man of high standing in the community. It was a strange sight to see Dr. Wallace, who had been usually bright and cheerful, looking so grave and serious. That was about the time that the "diabolical" King of Scotland entered and take a seat near the front.

But the Celtic enthusiasm that greeted the King's great national ode would have been a mere nothing had it not been for the fact that the King himself was present. The King of Scotland, who had been usually bright and cheerful, looking so grave and serious. That was about the time that the "diabolical" King of Scotland entered and take a seat near the front.

was settled for a while, he advanced, cleared his throat and spoke with gentle sarcasm to the man on the rocks.

"I do not wish to intrude upon your highness, but will your princeliness condescend to an interview?"

The only movement on Casimir's part was the inclining of his head in Fitzwilliam's direction. He remained with folded arms, his body turned to the left, and he said nothing.

"Good evening, Captain Fitzwilliam," "Major," corrected Fitzwilliam, astonished that the man should know his name.

"Ah—pardon!—major," said Charles Edward Casimir. "Then the memory of the Fitzwilliam said nothing more. He was staring up at the man on the rocks, trying to reconcile the man with his dress and vague resemblance.

"We—have met somewhere before," he said at last.

"If we have," you should recall it," was the cool answer. "If you cannot recall it it is probably hardly worth recalling."

"Yes, by heaven, we have met before!" exclaimed Fitzwilliam.

"A mere trifle, my dear cap—pardon me!" said Fitzwilliam. "It is a coincidence that strikes me as being—"

"No doubt I shall remember later," replied the major, who was staring at the man on the rocks, trying to reconcile the man with his dress and vague resemblance.

FOR LITTLE FOLK JUST BEFORE BEDTIME

The Sandman's Stories

THE BLACKSMITH AND THE TROLL.

"KING, king, king," went the ring of the hammer all day long on the anvil, and all day long the jolly blacksmith sang a merry song. But he did not feel so happy as when in his heart, for he was very, very poor, so poor, in fact, that he and his little daughter had nothing but dry bread and water for a week.

Then Hansel, the boy who worked for him, was the poorest of all. And Hansel had dared to fall in love with the prettiest girl in the village. So, while the hammer played a gay tune on the anvil, the smith was really sighing in his heart about his poverty. But Hansel went about his shop in his ragged old shoes and laughing at the smith's sighs that always ended his songs.

At dusk the glow of the forge cast a bright light over the shop, but without the door was darkness, so the smith did not see a small, queer-looking man that looked in.

"I would like you to mend this chain for me," squeaked the little man, as he held up a chain of polished silver. But the smith did not look around. Thinking it was some boy playing pranks, he laughed and said, "Run along home, laddy, and don't bother me when I am finishing up my work."

"Don't bother you, is it?" screamed the tiny man in a rage. "We will see about that—I am the King of the trolls. I live in the Ruby mountains, and when I come John Birt, blacksmith like you, I get impertinence. I will teach you a lesson yet," and the angry fellow disappeared in the night.

The smith was very sorry he had offended the King of the trolls, for he knew something bad was likely to happen. "If he flies fast enough he can do it in a day," replied Hansel, and the troll owned that the answer was very good. "Now, what must I do in order to be a good King of the trolls?" was the third question.

"Be as rich as I am," replied Hansel, opening his bag wide. "The very best thing you can do is to leave the smith alone and send me home with this bag full of rubies for a wedding present for his daughter."

And the old troll was so amused by Hansel's words that he had the troll return happy to the smith. In a few days Hansel and the girl were married and lived in the Ruby mountains for the rest of their days on the riches that the King of the trolls had given them.

FOR TIMES WOMEN WHO WANT TO KNOW What Is Seen in The Shops

BY THE SHOPPER.

In every home where there is a small boy, or a little girl who is inclined to be lively, the need of bandages, cotton, and other accessories for cut fingers, bruised heads, etc., is constant. Mothers who are well versed in the art of "first aid," are in a position to save a great many small bills, from physicians, and if the proper materials are at hand, they can dress a wound and care for it as well as a doctor.

Emergency cases, containing several widths of bandage, sterilized plaster, absorbent cotton, petroleum jelly, adhesive tape, surgical scissors, tweezers, and small safety pins, are for sale at a leather shoe store, not far from Thirteenth, for $4.50. When these supplies have been exhausted they may be renewed at almost any drug store or medical supply shop.

Daintily colored handkerchiefs, matching in tone the coloring of gown or hat, are seen in all the shops, and range in price from 12½ to 50 cents a piece. Imported French mouchoirs, hand embroidered, in clever and original designs, are 50 to 25 cents. The handkerchief counter near Eleventh is displaying some very attractive designs in green, and some of the daintier shades of blue, pink, etc. These are two for a quarter and 25 cents a piece, the ones with an embroidered initial are only 12½ cents.

In the show case of a house furnishing store in F street, between Twelfth and Thirteenth, is a display of pottery, in pastel shades of green and brown, which is individual, both in design and workmanship. Each piece of this ware is turned out by hand, and each piece is the result of the potter's own idea. The pottery is made at a shop in Boston where the wage earners do the best that is in them and manage to put some of their own individuality into each piece that they turn out. As one can imagine, the work is attractive and the results original.

Porridge sets for children, bread and milk sets, small toilet sets, breakfast plates, flower bowls, salad bowls, and candlesticks, are a few of the forms impressed upon the product of the potter. Conventionalized animal forms are much used in the decorative designs, and quaint and homely inscriptions are placed upon many articles. The effect of the finished product depends upon the skill of the potter, and the excellence of coloring and quaintness and simplicity of design. The price of these pieces ranges from 10 to 25.

As long as the one-piece dress is the vogue, the princess slip is a necessity and all kinds of styles are to be had, in any material from silk to lawn. Long cloth, nainsook, batiste, lawn, and crepe cloth are a few of the materials of which the slips are made. On the corner of Eighth street, at the market hall, a fine store is selling an odd lot of princess slips, chemises, combination slips, lawn slips, odd sizes, trimmed with lace at neck and sleeves, round neck with a flower into the bottom are 50c, marked down from $1.

Promotion of Armes Is Checked Again

The ambition of Major George A. Armes, U. S. A., of this city, to become a major general, is likely to be frustrated once more this year if Congressman James Mann, minority leader of the House, has anything to say about it.

The bill to promote Major Armes is an annual feature in the House legislation. Regularly it finds its way to the private calendar, and with equal regularity, opposition is made, and it is transferred to the regular calendar.

For four or five sessions it has been introduced.

Diplomats Having Fun at Convention

CHICAGO, June 22.—Foreign diplomats who are visiting Chicago during the Republican national convention seem to find the amusement of the convention more interesting than the state or condition of being in.

One of those who found it most difficult to gain an entrance to the convention hall is Frederic Pezet, minister from Peru. Senator Pezet presented his card to one of the doorkeepers and asked that it be taken to some one in authority. For answer the door was slammed in his face. Afterward he was admitted.

Alfred Dierckx, of the British Embassy, and son, Bertram Nixon, the other half. The son will receive $250 monthly until he is twenty-five years old, $50 monthly from then until he is thirty years old, and $100 monthly until he is thirty-five, when all his share will be delivered to him.
